But, in some other parts of America, as in New York, the term carpenter includes both the framer and the joiner; and, in truth, both branches of business are often performed by the same person. This term is also applied to the larvæ of other insects, such as the Tenthredo, or saw-fly, but is more generally confined to the lepidopters. Caterpillars are produced immediately from the egg; they are furnished with several pairs of feet, and have the shape and appearance of a worm. They contain the embryo of the perfect insect, inclosed within a muscular envelope, which is thrown off when the insect enters the nymph or chrysalis state, in which it remains for some time as if inanimate. €AT'-PIPE, n. See CATCALL.

€AT'SUP, n. See CATCHUP, KETCHUP.

€AT'TLE, n. sing. or pl. [Norm. catal, chastel, and chatters, goods, commodities, movables; Arm. chetal, beasts; Port. gado. In Syr. and Ch. גת and גתא signify a flock, herd, possession, goods. But Spelman alleges that the word chattel is contracted from capitalia, captal, from caput, a word used in the middle ages for all goods, movable and immovable, answering nearly to the use of Gr. κεφαλαιων, Acts xxii. 28, πολλου κεφαλαιου, "with a great price or sum I obtained this freedom." Qu. Sp. caudal, wealth, property, capital sum. Cattle may be from the root of It. cattare, to get, and denote possessions.]

1. Beasts or quadrupeds in general, serving for tillage or other labor, and for food to man. In its primary sense, the word includes camels, horses, asses, all the varieties of domesticated horned beasts or the bovine genus, sheep of all kinds, and goats, and perhaps swine. In this general sense it is constantly used in the Scriptures. See Job i. 3. Hence, it would appear that the word properly signifies possessions, goods; but whether from a word originally signifying a beast, — for in early ages beasts constituted the chief part of a man's property, — or from a root signifying to get or possess, Gr. κταομαι, It. cattare, or from capitalia, it is not easy to determine. This word is restricted to domestic beasts; but, in England, it includes horses, which it ordinarily does not in the United States, at least not in New England.

2. In the United States, cattle, in common usage, signifies only beasts of the bovine genus, oxen, bulls, cows and their young. In the laws respecting domestic beasts, horses, sheep, asses, mules and swine are distinguished from cattle, or neat cattle. Thus the law in Connecticut, requiring "that all the owners of any cattle, sheep, or swine, shall earmark or brand all their cattle, sheep, and swine," does not extend to horses. Yet it is probable that a law, giving damages for a trespass committed by cattle breaking into an inclosure, would be adjudged to include horses.

In Great Britain, beasts are distinguished into black cattle, including bulls, oxen, cows and their young, and small cattle, including sheep of all kinds and goats.

€AU$E, (kauz,) n. [Fr. cause; Sp. Port. and It. causa; L. causa, from the Celtic; Welsh acaws, effecting power, allied to cais, effort, ceisiaw, to seek or go after, to attempt; Arm. caus or cos. The primary sense is to urge, press, impel, like sequor, whence suit; hence, to accuse, to attack or follow with a charge. The root of this word coincides with that of castle, cast, &c., which express a driving. A cause is that which moves, excites, or impels, to action or effect; in law, a pressing for a claim. (See QUESTION.) Cause, sake, and thing, have the like radical sense.]

1. A suit or action in court; any legal process which a party institutes to obtain his demand, or by which he seeks his right, or his supposed right. This is a legal, scriptural, and popular use of the word, coinciding nearly with case, from cado, and action, from ago, to urge or drive.

5. That which a party or nation pursues; or rather pursuit, prosecution of an object. We say, Bible societies are engaged in a noble cause. [See the first definition.] Hence the word cause is used to denote that which a person or thing favors; that to which the efforts of an intelligent being are directed; as, to promote religion is to advance the cause of God. So we say, the cause of truth or of justice. In all its applications, cause retains something of its original meaning — struggle, impelling force, contest, effort to obtain or to effect something.

The Spanish has calzada, a causey, or way paved and raised; Port. calçada, a pavement, and stones used in paving. Both these words are evidently from the same root as Sp. calzas, Port. calçado, Sp. calzado, hose, loose breeches, trowsers, shoes, Fr. chausse; and the French word is evidently the same, with the loss of l. The sense is probably taken from putting on, covering, Port. calçar, to put on shoes or stockings, to pave; Sp. calzar, id.; L. calceo, calceus.] chaulsée, a bank, or raised way; Arm.

This was originally the art or science now called alchemy; the art of converting baser metals into gold. The order of Diocletian, directing search to be made for books treating of the wonderful art of making gold and silver, and all that should be found to be committed to the flames, proves the origin of this art to be as remote as the close of the third century; and it was probably somewhat earlier. Gibbon, ch. 13. It is not improbable that this art was used in counterfeiting coins. The common orthography is from χεω, to melt or fuse; the old orthography was from χυω, the same word, differently written; both having no foundation but a random guess. If lexicographers and writers had been contented to take the orthography of the nations in the south of Europe, where the origin of the word was doubtless understood, and through whom the word was introduced into England, the orthography would have been settled, uniform, and corresponding exactly with the pronunciation.]

The first mention of cherubs is in Gen. iii. 24, where the figure is not described; but their office was, with a flaming sword, to keep or guard the way of the tree of life. The two cherubs which Moses was commanded to make at the ends of the mercy-seat, were to be of beaten work of gold; and their wings were to extend over the mercy-seat, their faces toward each other, and between them was the residence of the Deity. Ex. xxv. This change of wheat and barley into oats he ascribes to a moist soil, wet weather, bad seed, &c. This opinion coincides with observations in America, as wheat is most liable to perish in moist land, and often in such places, almost all the wheat is killed, and instead of it chess often appears. But this change of wheat into chess is now denied, and the common opinion is affirmed, by the ablest botanists, to be erroneous.

This undoubtedly signifies patched shoes, for clut, in Saxon, does not signify a nail. The word clout, a nail, may be from the French clou, clouter, from L. clavus, from the root of L. claudo, cludo. Whether clouted brogues, in Shakspeare, signify patched shoes or shoes studded with nails, let the critic determine. Such shoes are common in England, and were formerly worn in America. In this case, the verb clout must signify, to nail, or fasten with nails; to stud.

Cant. Tales, 13,692. The Italians write garofano, probably for garofalo; Arm. genofles, genoflen. Quincy.*

2. In grammar, a point or character formed thus [:], used to mark a pause greater than that of a semicolon, but less than that of a period; or rather, it is used when the sense of the division of a period is complete, so as to admit a full point; but something is added by way of illustration, or the description is continued by an additional remark, without a necessary dependence on the foregoing members of the sentence. Thus,

A brute arrives at a point of perfection he can never pass: in a few years he has all the endowments he is capable of. Spect. No. iii.

The colon is often used before an address, quotation, or example. "Mr. Grey was followed by Mr. Erskine, who spoke thus: 'I rise to second the motion of my honorable friend.'" But the propriety of this depends on the pause, and this depends on the form of introducing the quotation; for after say, said, or a like word, the colon is not used, and seems to be improper. Thus, in our version of the Scriptures, such members are almost invariably followed by a comma: "But Jesus said to them, 'Ye know not what ye ask.'"

The use of the colon is not uniform; nor is it easily defined and reduced to rules. Indeed, the use of it might be dispensed with without much inconvenience.

[Colombina is, in Italian, a diminutive term of endearment, "pretty little dove," (Plaut. Cas. 1, 59, "Meus pullus passer, mea columba, mî lepus;" Asin. 3, 3, 103, "Dic igitur me anaticulam, columbam, vel catellum, Hirundinem, monedulam, passerculum, putillum;") and it denotes, in old Italian comedy, the name of a maid-servant, who is a perfect coquette, in which respect the character familiar to our English stage varies from the prototype. — E. The primary sense is a shoot, or that which is set.]
*1. In architecture, a long, round body of wood or stone, used to support or adorn a building, composed of a base, a shaft, and a capital. The shaft tapers from the base, in imitation of the stem of a tree. There are five kinds or orders of columns. 1. The Tuscan, rude, simple, and massy; the hight of which is fourteen semi-diameters or modules, and the diminution at the top from one sixth to one eighth of the inferior diameter. 2. The Doric, which is next in strength to the Tuscan, has a robust, masculine aspect; its hight is sixteen modules. 3. The Ionic is more slender than the Tuscan and Doric; its hight is eighteen modules. 4. The Corinthian is more delicate in its form and proportions, and enriched with ornaments; its hight should be twenty modules. 5. The Composite is a species of the Corinthian, and of the same hight. Encyc.
In strictness, the shaft of a column consists of one entire piece; but it is often composed of different pieces, so united as to have the appearance of one entire piece. It differs, in this respect, from a pillar, which primarily signifies a pile, composed of small pieces. But the two things are unfortunately confounded; and a column, consisting of a single piece of timber, is called a pillar, or pile.

An erect or elevated structure, resembling a column in architecture; as, the astronomical column at Paris, a kind of hollow tower, with a spiral ascent to the top; gnomonic column, a cylinder on which the hour of the day is indicated by the shadow of a style; military column, among the Romans; triumphal column, &c.

In manuscript books and papers, any separate perpendicular line or row of words or figures. A page may contain two or more columns; and, in arithmetic, many columns of figures may be added.
6. In botany, the aggregate stamen of a plant when the filaments are united into a tube around the styles, as in the Malvaceous plants, which have been called Columniferæ, i. e., column-bearers. The united stamens and styles of the plants of which the genus Orchis is the type, is called a column.

The points where these lines intersect the ecliptic are called cardinal points. Barlow.

And qu. the Ar. قَامَ kauma: Heb. Ch. קוּם to rise, or stand erect; to set or establish; to subsist, consist, remain; to rectify, or set in order; and in Arabic, to be thick, stiff, or congealed. The senses of the words appear to be very different; but we use come in the sense of rising or springing, applied to corn; the corn comes or comes up, G. keimen. So the butter comes, when it separates from the whey and becomes thick or stiff. And is not our common use of come, when we invite another to begin some act, or to move, equivalent to rise, being originally directed to persons sitting or reclining, in the Oriental manner? Coming implies moving, driving, shooting along, and so we use set; we say, to set forward; the tide sets northerly.]

1. To move toward; to advance nearer, in any manner, and from any distance. We say, the men come this way, whether riding or on foot; the wind comes from the west; the ship comes with a fine breeze; light comes from the sun. It is applicable, perhaps, to every thing susceptible of motion, and is opposed to go.

2. To draw nigh; to approach; to arrive; to be present; as, the time has come.

Come thou and all thy house into the ark. — Gen. vii.
All my time will I wait, till my change come. — Job xiv.
When shall I come and appear before God? — Ps. xlii.
Then shall the end come. — Matt. xxiv.
Thy kingdom come; thy will be done. — Matt. vi.

3. To advance and arrive at some state or condition; as, the ships came to action; the players came to blows; is it come to this?

His sons come to honor, and he knoweth it not. — Job xiv.

I wonder how he came to know what had been done; how did he come by his knowledge? the heir comes into possession of his estate; the man will come, in time, to abhor the vices of his youth; or he will came to be poor and despicable, or to poverty.

In these and similar phrases, we observe the process or advance is applied to the body or to the mind, indifferently; and to persons or events.

4. To happen or fall out; as, how comes that? let come what will. Hence, when followed by an object or person, with to or on, to befall; to light on.

It is the G. keimen, Icelandic keima, to bud or germinate.

7. To become.

8. To appear or be formed, as butter; to advance or change from cream to butter; a common use of the word; as, the butter comes. Hudibras.

9. Come, in the imperative, is used to excite attention, or to invite to motion or joint action; come, let us go.

This is the heir; come, let us kill him. — Matt. xxi.

When repeated, it sometimes expresses haste; come, come. Sometimes it expresses or introduces rebuke.

As the sense of come is to move, in almost any manner, in its various applications, that sense is modified indefinitely by other words used in connection with it. Thus, with words expressing approach, it denotes advancing nearer; with words expressing departure, as from, of, out of, &c., it denotes motion from. &c.

To come about; to happen, to fall out; to come to pass; to arrive. How did these things come about? So the French venir à bout, to come to the end, that is, to arrive.

To come about; to turn; to change; to come round. The wind will come about from west to east. The ship comes about. It is applied to a change of sentiments.

Come is an intransitive verb, but the participle come is much used with the substantive verb, in the passive form. "The end of all flesh is come." I am come, thou art come, he is come, we are come, &c. This use of the substantive verb, for have, is perhaps too well established to be rejected; but have or has should be used in such phrases. In the phrase, "come Friday, come Candlemas," there is an ellipsis of certain words; as, when Friday shall come.

Come, come, the repetition of come, expresses haste, or exhortation to hasten. Sometimes it introduces a threat.

The evidence of this law is to be found in the reports of those decisions, and the records of the courts. What decides this question is, the Spanish mode of writing the word with n tilde, titled n, compañia, for this is the manner of writing paño, cloth; whereas panis, bread, is written pan. The orthography of the word in the other languages is confirmatory of this opinion.]

COM-PARE', v. t.† [L. comparo, to prepare, to provide or procure, to make equal, to compare; con and paro, to prepare; It. parare, to dress, trim, adorn; also, to parry; Sp. parar, to prepare, to halt, to stop, to prevent, to detain, to stake at cards; Port. parar, to stop or cease to go forward; to meet or confine upon; to touch or be bounded; to tend; to drive at some end; to aim at; to come to; to hinder; to parry, or ward off; to turn or change in inclination or morals; to lay or stake, as a wager; Sp. parada, a halt, stop, pause; a fold for cattle; a relay of horses or mules; a dam or bank; a bet, stake, or wager; a parade, or place of exercise for troops; Port. id.; Arm. para; W. parodi, to prepare. This seems to be the ברא bara, of the Shemitic languages. The primary sense is, to throw, drive, or strike; hence, to drive or force off, to separate, to pare; hence, to trim, or dress, which may be from separating, as in the French parer des cuirs, to dress or curry leather; or from setting off, as we express the idea, that is, by enlargement, or display; or from setting in order, as we say, to fix. The sense of compare is allied to the Portuguese application of the word, to come to, to meet; and the L. par, equal, belongs to the same root, and seems to be included in comparo. One of the principal significations is, to stop; that is, to set; to fix. In fencing, it is to intercept by thrusting the weapon aside. In gaming, it is to lay or throw down. All the senses unite in that of extending, thrusting, or driving. W. par, that is, contiguous, preparedness, a pair, a fellow, Eng. peer, L. par. The latter word seems to signify, extended, or reaching to, and to be closely allied to the Portuguese sense of contiguity.]

Whereunto shall we liken the kingdom of God? Or with what comparison shall we compare it? — Mark iv.

6. In rhetoric, a figure by which two things are considered with regard to property or quality, which is common to them both; as, a hero is like a lion in courage. Here courage is common to hero and lion, and constitutes the point of resemblance. Encyc.

The distinction between similitude and comparison is, that the former has reference to the quality; the latter, to the quantity. Comparison is between more and less; similitude is between good and bad. Hannibal — hung like a tempest on the declivities of the Alps — is a likeness by similitude. The sublimity of the scriptural prophets exceeds that of Homer, as much as thunder is louder than a whisper — is a likeness by comparison.
J. Q. Adams, lect. ix.

But comparison has reference to quality as well as quantity.

The needle, with the card attached to it, turns on a pin in the center of the box. The box is covered with glass, to prevent the motion of the card from being disturbed by the wind, and is so suspended as to remain always in an horizontal position, notwithstanding the motion of the ship. Encyc.

6. An instrument used in surveying land, constructed, in the main, like the mariner's compass; but with this difference, that the needle is not fitted into the card, moving with it, but plays alone; the card being drawn on the bottom of the box, and a circle divided into 360 degrees on the limb. CON, [with or against.] A Latin inseparable preposition or prefix to other words. Ainsworth remarks that con and cum have the same signification, but that cum is used separately, and con in composition. Con and cum may be radically distinct words. The Irish comh, or coimh, is equivalent to the Latin con; and the Welsh cym, convertible into cyv, appears to be the same word, denoting, says Owen, a mutual act, quality, or effect. It is precisely equivalent to the Latin com, in comparo, compono; and the Latin com, in composition, may be the Celtic comh or cym. But, generally, it seems to be con, changed into com. Ainsworth deduces cum from the Greek συν; for originally it was written cyn. But this is probably a mistake.

Con coincides, in radical letters and in signification, with the Teutonic gain, gen, gean, igen, igien, in the English again, against; Sax. gean, ongean; Sw. igen; Dan. igien. Whatever may be its origin or affinities, the primary sense of the word is probably from some root that signifies to meet or oppose, or turn and meet; to approach to, or to be with. This is the radical sense of most prepositions of the like import. [See the English WITH, AGAIN.] So in Irish, coinne, a meeting; os coinne, opposite.

Con, in compounds, is changed into l before l, as in colligo, to collect, and into m before a labial, as in comparo, to compare. Before a vowel or h, the n is dropped; as in coalesco, to coalesce, to co-operate; cohibeo, to restrain. It denotes union, as in conjoin; or opposition, as in conflict, contend. Qu. W. gan, with.

CON, [abbreviated from Latin contra, against.] In the phrase pro and con, for and against, con denotes the negative side of a question. As a noun, a person who is in the negative; as, the pros and cons.

CON, v. t. [Sax. cennan, connan, cunnan, to know, to be able, to be skillful or wise; and cennan, to bear or bring forth, Gr. γενναω; and cunnian, to try, to attempt, to prove, L. conor; whence cunning, skillful, experienced, or skill, experience; the latter word, cunnian, coincides in sense with Sax. anginnan, onginnan, to begin, to try, to attempt, L. conor. D. kennen, to know, understand, or be acquainted; kunnen, to be able, can, to know or understand, to hold or contain; the last signification coinciding with the W. gann, to contain. G. kennen, to know; and können, to be able. Dan. kan, to be able, pret. kunde, whence kundskab, knowledge, skill, experience. Sw. kanna, to know; kuna, to be able, to be skilled, to know. The primary sense is, to strain or stretch, which gives the sense of strength, power, as in can, and of holding, containing, comprehending; as, contain, from contineo, teneo, Gr. τεινω, L. tendo. And this signification connects these words with gin, in its compounds, begin, Sax. beginnan, anginnan, &c., to strain, to try, to stretch forward and make an effort; also with the Gr. γενναω, L. gignor, to beget, or to bring forth. See Class Gn, No. 29, 36, 40, 42, 45, 58. In the sense of know, con signifies to hold or to reach.]

CON-SENT', n.† [L. consensus; It. consenso; Fr. consentement; Sp. consentimiento; from L. consentio, to be of one mind, to agree; con and sentio, to think, feel, or perceive; Sp. consentir; Port. Fr. id.; It. consentire. See SENSE and ASSENT.]

1. Agreement of the mind to what is proposed or stated by another; accord; hence, a yielding of the mind or will to that which is proposed; as, a parent gives his consent to the marriage of his daughter.

We generally use this word in cases where power, rights, and claims, are concerned. We give consent, when we yield that which we have a right to withhold; but we do not give consent to a mere opinion or abstract proposition. In this case, we give our assent. But assent is also used in conceding what we may withhold. We give our assent to the marriage of a daughter. Consequently, assent has a more extensive application than consent. But the distinction is not always observed. Consent often amounts to permission.

Defraud ye not one another, except with consent for a time. — 1 Cor. vii.

2. Accord of minds; agreement; unity of opinion.

All with one consent began to make excuse. — Luke xiv.
The company of priests murder by consent. — Hos. vi.

3. Agreement; coherence; correspondence in parts, qualities, or operation.

Such is the world's great harmony, that springs
From union, order, full consent of things. Pope.

4. In the animal economy, an agreement, or sympathy, by which one affected part of the system affects some distant part. This consent is supposed to exist in, or be produced by, the nerves, and the affections to be communicated from one part to another by means of their ramifications and distributions through the body. Thus the stone in the bladder, by vellicating the fibers, will produce spasms and colic in the bowels; a shameful thing seen or heard will produce blushing in the cheeks. Quincy. Encyc.

But many facts indicate that other causes than nervous communication produce sympathy.

CON-SENT', v. i. [L. consentio. See the noun.]

1. Literally, to think with another. Hence, to agree or accord. More generally, to agree in mind and will; to yield to what one has the power, the right, or the disposition to withhold, or refuse to grant.

If sinners entice thee, consent thou not. — Prov. i.
And Saul was consenting to Stephen's death. — Acts viii.
Only let us consent to them, and they will dwell with us. — Gen. xxxiv.

2. In logic, a proposition collected from the agreement of other previous propositions; the conclusion which results from reason or argument; inference; deduction.

From this train of argument, the consequence is obvious.

3. Connection of cause and effect; consecution.

I felt
That I must after thee, with this my son;
Such fatal consequence unites us three. Milton.

4. Influence; tendency, as to effects. CON-SID'ER-ING, ppr. Fixing the mind on; meditating on; pondering; viewing with care and attention; deliberating on.

Note. — We have a peculiar use of this word, which may be a corruption for considered, or which may be a deviation from analogy by an insensible change in the structure of the phrase. "It is not possible for us to act otherwise, considering the weakness of our nature." As a participle, this word must here refer to us, or the sentence can not be resolved by any rule of English syntax. It would be correct to say, "It is not possible for us to act otherwise, the weakness of our nature being considered;" or, "We, considering the weakness of our nature, can not act otherwise." But the latter phrase is better grammar than it is sense. We use other participles in like manner; as, "Allowing for tare, the weight could not be more than a hundred pounds." These and similar phrases are anomalous. But considering is no more a kind of conjunction, in such a phrase, than it is a noun.

CON'SO-NANCE, n. [Fr., from L. consonantia, consonans, from consono, to sound together; con and sono, to sound. See Sound and Tone.]

1. Accord or agreement of sounds. In music, consonance is an accord of sounds, simultaneously produced, which creates an agreeable sensation in the ear as the third, fifth, and eighth. It derives, also, the according intervals. When the interval of a consonance is invariable, it is called perfect; but when it may be either major or minor, it is termed imperfect. Busby.

CON'SO-NANT, n. A letter, or element of speech, having either no vocality, as p and the other mutes, or only an imperfect vocality, as b, l, &c. For this reason, consonants are ordinarily sounded only in connection with a vowel, and hence the name. The consonants are better called articulations, as they are the names given to the several closings or junctions of the organs of speech, which precede and follow the openings of the organs with which the vowels are uttered. These closings are perfect, and wholly intercept the voice, as in the syllables ek, ep, et, or imperfect, and admitting some slight sound, as in em, en. Hence, some articulations are called mutes, and others semi-vowels. The consonants begin or end syllables, and their use is to determine the manner of beginning or ending the vocal sounds. These closings or configurations of the organs, being various, serve to diversify the syllables, as in uttering ba, da, pa, or ab, ad, ap; and, although b and p may be considered as representing no sounds at all, yet they so modify the utterance of ab, ap, or ba, pa, that the slight difference between these articulations may be perceived as far as the human voice can be distinctly heard.

The lord high constable of England was the seventh officer of the crown. To this officer, and to the earl marshal, belonged the cognizance of contracts, deeds of arms without the realm, and combats and blazonry within the realm. The power of this officer was so great, and so improperly used, that it was abridged by the 13th Richard II., and was afterward forfeited in the person of Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, in 1521. It has never been granted to any person since that time, except pro hac vice, or on a particular occasion. Encyc.

The petty constables are chosen by the jury of the court leet, or, if no court is held, they are appointed by two justices of the peace. In London, a constable is nominated in each precinct by the inhabitants, and confirmed at the court of wardmote. Copper in sheets is much used for covering the bottoms of ships, for boilers, and other utensils; mixed with tin and zinc, it is used in enamel-painting, dyeing, &c.; mixed with tin, it forms bell-metal; with a smaller proportion, bronze; and with zinc, it forms brass, pinchbeck, &c. This application of face or countenance, which seems to be of high antiquity, proceeded probably from the practice of turning away the face to express anger, displeasure, and refusal — a practice still common, but probably universal among rude nations. CRĒ'BROUS, a. Frequent.

CRĒ'DENCE, n. [It. credenza; Fr. creance; from L. credens, from credo, to believe. See CREED.]

1. Belief; credit; reliance of the mind on evidence of facts derived from other sources than personal knowledge, as from the testimony of others. We give credence to an historian of unsuspected integrity, or to a story which is related by a man of known veracity.

2. That which gives a claim to credit, belief, or confidence; as, a letter of credence, which is intended to commend the bearer to the confidence of a third person. [See PROTHESIS.]

CRĒ'DENCE, v. t. To give credence to; to believe.

CRE-DEN'TIALS, (-shalz,) n. pl. [Rarely or never used in the singular.]

That which gives credit; that which gives a title or claim to confidence; the warrant on which belief, credit, or authority, is claimed, among strangers; as the letters of commendation and power given by a government to an embassador or envoy, which give him credit at a foreign court. So the power of working miracles given to the apostles may be considered as their credentials, authorizing them to propagate the gospel, and entitling them to credit.

CRED-I-BIL'I-TY, n. [Fr. credibilité, from L. credibilis.]

Credibleness; the quality or state of a thing which renders it possible to be believed, or which admits belief, on rational principles; the quality or state of a thing which involves no contradiction or absurdity. Credibility is less than certainty, and greater than possibility; indeed, it is less than probability, but is nearly allied to it. [See CREDIBLE.]

CRED'I-BLE, a. [L. credibilis.]

1. That may be believed; worthy of credit. A thing is credible, when it is known to be possible, or when it involves no contradiction or absurdity; it is more credible, when it is known to come within the ordinary laws or operations of nature. With regard to the divine Being and his operations, every thing is credible which is consistent with his perfections, and supported by evidence or unimpeachable testimony, for his power is unlimited. With regard to human affairs, we do not apply the word to things barely possible, but to things which come within the usual course of human conduct, and the general rules of evidence.

2. Worthy of belief; having a claim to credit; applied to persons. A credible person is one of known veracity and integrity, or whose veracity may be fairly deduced from circumstances. We believe the history of Aristides and Themistocles, on the authority of credible historians.

CRED'I-BLE-NESS, n. Credibility; worthiness of belief, just claim to credit. [See CREDIBILITY.]

CRED'I-BLY, adv. In a manner that deserves belief; with good authority to support belief.

CRED'IT, n. [Fr. credit; It. credito; Sp. id.; L. creditum. See CREED.]

1. Belief; faith; a reliance or resting of the mind on the truth of something said or done. We give credit to a man's declaration, when the mind rests on the truth of it, without doubt or suspicion, which is attended with wavering. We give credit to testimony or to a report, when we rely on its truth and certainty.

2. Reputation derived from the confidence of others; esteem; estimation; good opinion founded on a belief of a man's veracity, integrity, abilities, and virtue; as, a physician in high credit with his brethren. Hence,

3. Honor; reputation; estimation; applied to men or things. A man gains no credit by profaneness; and a poem may lose no credit by criticism. The credit of a man depends on his virtues; the credit of his writings, on their worth.

4. That which procures or is entitled to belief; testimony; authority derived from one's character, or from the confidence of others. We believe a story on the credit of the narrator. We believe in miracles on the credit of inspired men. We trust to the credit of an assertion made by a man of known veracity.

5. Influence derived from the reputation of veracity or integrity, or from the good opinion or confidence of others; interest; power derived from weight of character, from friendship, fidelity, or other cause. A minister may have great credit with a prince. He may employ his credit to good or evil purposes. A man uses his credit with a friend; a servant, with his master.

6. In commerce, trust; transfer of goods in confidence of future payment. When the merchant gives a credit, he sells his wares on an expressed or implied promise that the purchaser will pay for them at a future time. The seller believes in the solvability and probity of the purchaser, and delivers his goods on that belief or trust; or he delivers them on the credit or reputation of the purchaser. The purchaser takes what is sold, on credit. In like manner, money is loaned on the credit of the borrower.

7. The capacity of being trusted; or the reputation of solvency and probity which entitles a man to be trusted. A customer has good credit or no credit with a merchant.

8. In book-keeping, the side of an account in which payment is entered; opposed to debit. This article is carried to one's credit, and that to his debit. We speak of the credit side of an account.

9. Public credit; the confidence which men entertain in the ability and disposition of a nation, to make good its engagements with its creditors; or the estimation in which individuals hold the public promises of payment, whether such promises are expressed or implied. The term is also applied to the general credit of individuals in a nation; when merchants and others are wealthy, and punctual in fulfilling engagements; or when they transact business with honor and fidelity; or when transfers of property are made with ease for ready payment. So we speak of the credit of a bank, when general confidence is placed in its ability to redeem its notes; and the credit of a mercantile house rests on its supposed ability and probity, which induce men to trust to its engagements. When the public credit is questionable, it raises the premium on loans.

Cherish public credit. Washington.

10. The notes or bills which are issued by the public, or by corporations or individuals, which circulate on the confidence of men in the ability and disposition in those who issue them, to redeem them. They are sometimes called bills of credit.

12. A sum of money due to any person; any thing valuable standing on the creditor side of an account. A has a credit on the books of B. The credits are more than balanced by the debits.

CRIME, n.† [L. crimen; Gr. κριμα; It. crime: Port. id.; Sp. crimen; Fr. crime; Arm. crim; Norm. crisme. This word is from the root of Gr. κρινω, L. cerno, to separate, to judge, to decree, to condemn. But this verb seems to be composed of two distinct roots; for, in Latin, the pret. is crevi, which can not be formed from cerno; and in Greek, the derivatives, κριθω, κριαις, κριτης, can not be regularly formed from κρινω. The Gr. κριμα is undoubtedly a contraction; for in Norman the word is crisme. The root, then, of these derivatives is the same as of the Ir. criathar, a sieve, W. rhidyll, Eng. riddle; W. rhidiaw, to secrete, to separate. We have screen, a riddle, from the root of κρινω, and riddle, from the Celtic root of κριαις, κριτης. To judge is to decide, to separate, or cut off, hence to condemn; a crime is that which is condemned.]

1. An act which violates a law, divine or human; an act which violates a rule of moral duty; an offense against the laws of right, prescribed by God or man, or against any rule of duty plainly implied in those laws. A crime may consist in omission or neglect, as well as in commission, or positive transgression. The commander of a fortress, who suffers the enemy to take possession by neglect, is as really criminal as one who voluntarily opens the gates without resistance.

But, in a more common or restricted sense, a crime denotes an offense, or violation of public law, of a deeper and more atrocious nature; a public wrong; or a violation of the commands of God, and the offenses against the laws made to preserve the public rights; as treason, murder, robbery, theft, arson, &c. Crimes and misdemeanors are punishable by indictment, information, or public prosecution; trespasses or private injuries, at the suit of the individuals injured. This is the root of create, or from the same root. Cre, Owen deduces from rhe, with the prefix cy; and rhe, he renders a run or swift motion. This is certainly contracted from rhed, a race, the root of ride; Owen to the contrary notwithstanding. All the senses of these words unite in that of shooting forth, driving forward, or producing. There is a class of words a little different from the foregoing, which exactly give the sense of cry. The latter root, rhyd, crydu, would give cri, rough, raw, crude. Cry is a contracted word; but whether from the former or latter class of roots may be less obvious — possibly, all are from one source. CUS'TU-MA-RY, n. A book of laws and customs.

CUT, v. t.; pret. and pp. CUT. [Norm. cotu, cut. This word coincides in elements with the W. cat, a piece, cateia, to cut, cwta, short, cwtau, to shorten, and with ysgythru, to cut off, to lop, to shred, to carve, which Owen deduces from ysgwth, a push, from gwth, a push or thrust, gwthiaw, to push, thrust, press. Whether cut is derived to us from the Welsh or not, may be a question; but I have not found the word in any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages. It is obviously from a common root with the L. cædo and cudo, and the primary sense is, to thrust, to drive, to strike; and to cut off is primarily to strike off. We have proof of this in our own language; for a stroke with a whip is called a cut, and our common people, when they urge a person to ride or run with haste, cry out, Cut on, cut on. The fact is the same with many other words which now signify to separate with an edged tool. See Class Gd, No. 2, 4, 8, 43, 49, 56, 59, and, in a different dialect, Class Gs, No. 5, 6, 28, 32, 40, 41, 42, 67.]

To separate the parts of any body by an edged instrument, either by striking, as with an ax, or by sawing or rubbing; to make a gash, incision, or notch, which separates the external part of a body; as, to cut the flesh. It signifies, also, to cut into pieces; to sever or divide; as, to cut timber in the forest. But when an entire separation of the body is intended, it is usually followed by off, down, asunder, in two, in pieces, or other word denoting such severance. CZĂR'O-WITZ, n. The title of the eldest son of the czar of Russia.

D.

D, in the English alphabet, is the fourth letter and the third articulation. It holds the same place in the English as in the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, Samaritan, Greek, and Latin alphabets. In the Arabic, it is the eighth; in the Russian, the fifth; and in the Ethiopic, the nineteenth letter.

D is a dental articulation, formed by placing the end of the tongue against the gum just above the upper teeth. It is nearly allied to T, but is not so close a letter, or rather it does not interrupt the voice so suddenly as T, and in forming the articulation, there is a lingual and nasal sound, which has induced some writers to rank D among the lingual letters. It has but one sound, as in do, din, bad: and is never quiescent in English words, except in a rapid utterance of such words as handkerchief.

As a numeral, D represents five hundred, and when a dash or stroke is placed over it, thus, $\overline{D}$, it denotes five thousand.

As an abbreviation, D. stands for Doctor; as, M. D. Doctor of Medicine; D. T. Doctor of Theology, or S. T. D. Doctor of Sacred Theology; D. D. Doctor of Divinity, or dono dedit; D. D. D. dat, dicat, dedicat; and D. D. D. D. dignum Deo donum dedit.
